What this means in the (more common) case you have a 6-die task and 2 of those dice don't match the result you need, is that you would just keep the two successful dice and discard the two unsuccessful ones. This is not entirely accurate. What it really means is that, since you are given only 3 dice to use and you can only choose among the successes, you can use a slightly more nuanced set of rules than it sounds like. What this means in practice is that, if you have a 6-die task and roll two successes, you might discard the result you need to. But if you have a 6-die task and roll three successes, then you don't need to worry about it. EABA 3: p155 Possibly the most confusing thing in the task description. In EABA 2, it is clear that the only rule here is that you roll all the dice you have, and then choose the top three. But in EABA 3, it says that, if you have a 6-die task and you want to discard the result you do not need, you must roll all 6 dice. So there is no way to say that if you have 6 dice and roll only two successes, you can't just choose the ones you need. The game still also has the "discard the highest result" rule that was introduced in EABA 2, and that applies to every task, regardless of number of dice. This means that, if you only have 3 dice and need to discard a result, you have no option but to roll all 3 dice, discard the one you don't need, and try again. I'm not sure if this "best three" rule that applies to all tasks, is "good" or not, but I don't think it's terrible. I just think it's confusing and easy to get wrong. There's also the case of if you have a 6-die task, and you roll 3 successes, but you do not have any failures, and you are discarding the lowest result, you may well end up with two results left over. Yes, you can choose to discard the lowest, and then pick the second lowest if that is better, but what if you have 2 successes, 1 success and 1 failure, and your result is the highest. I would have expected that, in this situation, 82157476af
